Medical Mistakes in the News

Seattle Children's hospital has been under fire for four different medical malpractice cases that have occurred in the last six months, two of which resulted in patient death. These tragedies echo the wrongful death of Michael Blankenship, a 15-year-old boy who passed away over a year ago after being wrongfully prescribed a high-dose pain patch called Fentanyl. Blankenship had been admitted to Seattle Children's for routine dental surgery, but because he was autistic, was prescribed the Fentanyl patch as an alternative to oral or injected pain medication. Michael's mother, Tammy Jarbo-Blankenship even made inquiries to the prescribing dentist, the resident dentist, the discharge nurse, the pharmacy technician and the head pharmacist at the hospital about the medication. Despite her persistence her son was still prescribed a pain medication that is normally meant for people who are used to taking long-term narcotics. After the wrongful death of her young son, Jarbo-Blankenship hired Seattle attorney Chris Davis to help with her case. When Komo 4 News asked Davis about the recent tragedies at Children's Hospital he voiced his sadness stating that "here we are 18 months later and it's happening again".

normally narrow heart-valve opening, and peripheral pulmonary stenosis, abnormally narrow blood vessels in the lungs. A catheter is inserted through the groin with a small balloon at the tip that is used to open the vessels while it travels up through the lungs. Unfortunately, during the procedure the pressure from the balloon caused Osman's vein to burst and fill his lungs with blood resulting in permanent brain damage. Fueled by the vague answers from Children's Hospital about his son's case, Osman's father wrote the Department of Health and the state's Medical Quality Assurance Commission has just started investigating the choice of the procedure, how it was done, and the care that was provided after the aneurysm was detected.

The first wrongful death since Michael Blankenship's occurred on September 15, 2010 when eight-month old Kaia Zautner, who was already suffering from heart problems and recovering from multiple surgeries when she was incorrectly administered 10 times the proper dose of a medication called calcium chloride. Her weakened immune system could not handle the added stress and she died five days later after suffering a brain hemorrhage.

Only two days after Zautner's incident, newborn Avery Plaster was being transported to Children's from Evergreen Hospital when she was administered medication that had not been previously approved by a licensed medical provider and died soon after. Her cause of death is still unknown but the incorrectly administered medication may not be responsible.

The latest incident happened on September 25, 2010 when a 23-year-old man was admitted to Children's with life-threatening respiratory failure and was incorrectly administered epinephrine through an IV. It was later admitted that the proper procedure would have been to administer the medication as an injection instead of intravenously.

The alarming rate at which these cases have occurred has raised many issues with the safety of Seattle Children's Hospital. Medical director Dr. David Fisher insists that "Children's is safe", and adds that their "patients are complex" and that unfortunately, human error can occur, especially in a large facility that treats "1,000 of the sickest and most vulnerable kids every day". He goes on to assure the public that there is no systemic problem at Children's but that they failed in their effort "to provide safe care" and are "devastated" by the recent events. Even though the hospital claimed that it changed its guidelines to prevent accidental overdoses after what happened to Michael Blankenship they have recently clarified that those changes were for opiates, not routine medications. Chris Davis told Kiro 7 news that the problem is that the state gets the reports but has little authority to investigate them because "there's really no teeth, enforcement teeth, behind it."

In response to the recent tragedies, Seattle Children's Hospital released a letter stating the changes that they were going to make to their policies concerning the safety process and how their high risk medicine is regulated and administered. Insisting that providing a safe and healing environment is the greatest priority, Children's is committed to identifying and fixing the gaps in their medication process to prevent any more tragedies from occurring.
